Gladys Glad on BEAUTY

It certainly is a task to keep looking and feeling as cool as the proverbial cucumber during the sweltering days that have already upon us. But I swooped down you will believe me, it really isn't as difficult a task as the average girl imagines. You really can manage to look delightfully crisp and cool, even on the most torrid of summer days, if you will tell you how.

Gladys Glad

What most women think of first when they feel hot is a cold shower. But what you will find is infinitely more cooling and refreshing is a hot bath followed by an alcoholic rub. Cold baths, I claim, are stimulating and energizing, and therefore likely to increase perspiration. Hot baths have a soothing, relaxing effect on the body. And an alcohol rub after such a bath freshens the body delightfully. If you begin to feel hot, sticky and tired at any time during the day, fill your tub with clear warm water and relax in it for a few minutes. Then, using a milk soap, cleanse your entire body. You'll need a soap, of course, to remove any dirt, oil and salts of perspiration. Then rinse yourself well, and gently pat your skin dry.

Next, smooth a generous amount of rubbing alcohol over your entire body with a pad of, cotton, and pat it briskly into your skin. If you prefer a more fragrant solution, you may add one of a pint of rubbing alcohol, an ounce of violet ammonia, half an ounce of spirits of camphor and half an ounce of rosewater. If this lotion is patted on your body after the warm bath, it will cool your skin and leave it fresh and fragrant.

In dressing for coolness, colors, styles and fabrics must all be considered. Dark, drab lines are heavy and depressing, and should not be worn. White, pastel shades, dainty pinks, cool blues and greens, with lingerie touches, all look dainty and cool. In styles, high-necked, long-sleeved frocks should be avoided. They look far too hot for summer wear. Light, short-sleeved dresses make one look immeasurably cooler.

In addition to bathing and dressing properly, a girl can increase her appearance of crisp freshness by the manner in which she keeps her hair. Always keep your hair soft and fluffy. Frequent shampoos should be resorted to. The hair style is also important. Frizzy, untidy coiffures look hot and unkempt. The hair should be arranged neatly and should not be allowed to fall heavily about the shoulders, neck and face.

Dorothy Dix's Letter Box

DEAR DOROTHY DIX—We live on a small farm, one hour's ride from the city. We are a young couple of small means and have three little children. We work hard to try to get along and deny ourselves every luxury. But here is our trouble: Every week-end our friends come out to enjoy them, but we can't afford them. They are literally eating us out of house and home. On the week-ends they will descend on us fifteen or twenty strong and eat up a week's supply of provisions, so by Monday there is nothing left for the children. We have wrestled with this problem for three or four years without finding any solution for it. I do all of my own housework and keeps me tied to the range so that I don't have time to even speak to the guests who are so lavish in their praise, but not with their money of the good food I give them. What to do?

MOTHER'S WIFE.

Answer: If I were you, I should write a nice little note to each and every one of your self-invited guests and tell them that on account of the depression you have decided to earn a little pin money by serving meals over the week-end at so much per supper, and that you hope very much that you will have their patronage. Make it plain to them that there will be no free list and be sure to present your bill to the very first ones who come so he or she will see that it is no bluff on your part, and that they have to pay for what they eat.

Get busy at once with your announcement that you have turned your house into a paying restaurant instead of a free hotel, for the summer is the time when grafters are abroad in the land and when everybody who lives on a farm or has a country place is the predestined victim of those who want to eat and drink without money and without price. They are the worst form of the roaching.

Why people who in the wintertime and in town would never dream of inviting themselves to stay over night or to dine, would they be capable of the impertinence of taking along with them a lot of their family and friends and superimposing them upon your hospitality, commit the crime against even common decency in the summertime, nobody knows. But they do.

Everybody who lives out of town has experienced the sudden passion of affection and longing to see them that arises in July and August in the breasts of their city friends and relatives who write or telegraph that they can't be parted from them any longer and to meet them at the 6:30 train on Saturday and that they are coming for a nice long visit.

And everybody who has a country place knows the awful sinking that comes in the pits of their stomachs when they see a crowded automobile drive up and seven or eight people descend therefrom and file into the house. They are just starved and any little thing will do, provided it consists of a square meal. And they just have brought along their friends, the Joneses and the Smiths, whom they know you are just dying to meet and to feed.

Usually the hostess gives these spongers a welcome that is cold enough to freeze the cocktail in their glasses, but it does no good. No barbed speech penetrates their rhinoceros hides. They have saved a few dollars by passing by all of the hot-dog stands and restaurants that strew the road, and they should worry that they have made you treat them and their friends. They forget that it is ten times more trouble to entertain company in the country than it is in town, and that you have come to the country yourself for a rest, which you never get. Something should be done about the dead-beat guest.

DEAR MISS DIX—My husband is an A-1 plus perfect piece of humanity. He doesn't drink, smokes moderately and remembers always to use the ashtray. He is instantly concerned if I look blue or not well and does something about it. Flirt for a good time or takes me to the theater. He gets all the money I want. Never makes me feel that he is holding the purse strings. He is always bringing home little treats that are appreciated by any woman. He is man enough to be head of the house without being bumptious about it. He doesn't want to stay at home like a castoff shoe every night. Neither does he crave wild parties. He doesn't go into a trance when I ask him to help the girl. He doesn't rave to me about some beautiful women he has met. He does not tell stale jokes. Neither his people or mine live with us. He treats my family just as he does his own. He never brags about how his mother used to cook. He is kind, considerate, loveable, good-looking, healthy, a good worker and provider and a real help around the house. In a word, he is perfection.

A HAPPY WIFE.

Answer: What a man! I never heard of such a paragon. And how happy you must be, indeed, it is too much of a strain upon your constitution living up to your ideal.

But here is a thought: Perhaps your attitude toward your husband has something to do with his having attained such a state of grace and part of his perfection is due to your appreciation of his good qualities. As long as you admire him so much he has to be what you think he is, he has to live up to his blue china. I confess the thought has often occurred to me that the wives who were always finding fault with their husbands and reproaching them with their weaknesses were taking the wrong way to reform them and were a poor inspiration for better things.

There is no doubt, for instance, that a woman who is jealous of every woman her husband looks at simply eggs him on to little affairs. He knows she is going to give him the name and he thinks he had as well have the game. And I knew one wife who got pretty clothes out of a stingy husband by always parading his generosity before her friends and boasting of what lovely things he gave her. After all, husbands, like wives, are amenable to flattery.

READ THIS FIRST:

Joan Spencer, a small town school teacher, recently disappointed in love, is engaged as secretary to Julian Shane, a wealthy bachelor. Here her new position and enjoys the life at Shane's luxurious summer home. Her employer reprimands her, however, when Joan comes in late after an evening with Alex Garrity, a friend of Sheila's. One morning Julian comments on the color of Sheila's dress. Joan remembers that Sheila is jealous of the new secretary. Sheila turns down a suggestion of Sheila's that Joan go to a woman friend of her's as secretary.

(Now Go on With the Story.)

CHAPTER 10.

So that explained that! Julian wanted her to stay. She knew that from the tone of his voice and she knew that if she were the other girl, she would recognize it, too. Quite a row at Sheila's classic profile outlined in the candlelight.

If she expected to find an expression of frustration on the actress' face, she was doomed to disappointment. Sheila smiled at her.

"Heavens, darling Julian, I didn't mean to take her away. I thought it might have been more pleasant for Joan. You are a dreadful taskmaster, you know."

"I think that's what you'd call bulldog," Joan said smoothly and turned to look at Julian. "I find him a most considerate and interesting employer."

She was sorry as soon as she spoke, realizing that to any fool there was some plan playing with fire. Why couldn't she take her victory gracefully and keep quiet?

In the brief silence that followed, Sheila slipped her hand over Julian's. She had no eyes for Joan, they were fixed on Julian's face and her lashes were half hid with her glance.

"Please don't feel bad, darling. I didn't really mean it." She almost crooned the words. Joan felt that she was forgotten, and for a reason that she did not look at Julian's face. "Shall we drive tonight?" Sheila asked Julian when they were having their coffee.

"I— you rather disrupted my day today, Sheila. I'm working on a big deal and I'd like to get through while I'm in it completely. It won't be much riding. This afternoon I'm turning into a long drizzle."

"But I want to drive. I think you're working too hard anyway. I haven't seen you for a month and I've loads of things I want to talk over with you."

"All right, dear. Later. But I'd like to get some work done."

Sheila did a surprising thing then. She turned to Joan. "You must have some power over him."

Joan was actually surprising both to Julian and herself. She said: "I have."

Joan went up to her own room.

"Well, well," she said to the chintz chair, her radio and her books. "Here I am again. It seems that I'm to be with you a little longer if I can't help it. Good night. Good night."

She apologized to the desk. "I just couldn't help it. I don't trust that woman. I don't think she is good for our employer and I know she's not going to be good to me. But little Joan can watch her step and if she sticks to her job, there can't be any room for complaint, can there?"

She closed her door resolutely against the sound of Sheila when for their returning footsteps, but long into the night she tossed and turned them. She pictured them walking on dewy paths, with Julian conscious of the presence of Sheila's head on his arm. The night air would scent and hurt that ashen hair and if Joan thought the light in Sheila's eyes was a glitter, they would be like stars for Julian.

She clenched her own small hand, remembering that hand's tapering hand that closed over Julian's brown one at the dinner table.

Joan didn't intend to fight for Julian even when she voted her opinion of Sheila True, she didn't believe that Sheila was the woman for Julian. She wanted him to have the best and her instincts were entirely against Sheila, but Joan was a level-headed girl and knew that she was jealous and her jealousy colored her point of view.

If Julian cared for Sheila it was none of her business and she'd make a fresh start in forgetting that he might be anything but her employer.

The next day was worse than Monday. Julian rode, played tennis and golf and snatched what minutes he could between to get at work. To Joan—

On Friday Joan said to him, "Mr. Shane, we haven't done much work-ends and I'd like to have a little vacation. I have arrangements to do in New York. Do you mind if I run in tomorrow and come back late Sunday or Monday morning?"

"No, of course not, child. I told you that any time you want time off it is yours unless we happen to be doing something particular. Take your time. We won't start the fourth chapter until next week."

"Thanks. I've finished the finished copies of all that we've done and this afternoon I'll finish this chapter and we'll get a fresh start next week."

Joan wished she'd felt a little more
